"Stop the Spiral of Violence –for a New Policy of Peace and Détente now!"

In recent years both NATO and Russia have increasingly engaged in deterrence through rearmament and threats against each other rather than working for common security all over Europe through confidence and security building measures, arms control, and disarmament. By so doing, they have failed to comply with their commitments to develop a peaceful European order, to strengthen the United Nations and to peacefully settle disputes including mandatory arbitration by a third party – obligations to which all heads of state in Europe and North America formally agreed in the 'Charter of Paris' 25 years ago.

During the years since the signing of the Paris Charter, many mistakes have contributed to eroding the laboriously built trust and hampering the peaceful resolution of crises and conflicts. Without cooperation with Russia there will be risks of confrontation, a new arms race, escalation of the Ukraine conflict, and more terror and wars in the Middle East intensifying the flow of refugees. European security - regardless of the assessment of each other's social order - will not be possible without cooperation between Russia and its neighbors.

This is the central lesson from the policy of détente followed in the 1960s and 1970s, especially the contributions of US President John F. Kennedy and the West German government under Chancellor Willy Brandt, who was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1971, on the grounds that "Brandt outstretched his hand for reconciliation between old enemies." At that time, no one could know that less than 20 years later this policy of détente would result in creating the conditions for the peaceful fall of the Berlin Wall and Central Europe's Iron Curtain.

Today, as then, a way out of the deadlock of confrontation is only possible through cooperation, understanding and reconciliation with supposed enemies.

In early 2009 the 'architect of détente', Egon Bahr – together with Helmut Schmidt, Richard von Weizsäcker and Hans Dietrich Genscher made a joint appeal for a "nuclear weapons free world", reminding newly elected US President Obama that 'our century's key word is cooperation. No global problem can be solved by confrontation or by the use of military force.'

Similar views were expressed in the US by a broad range of public figures across the political spectrum such as George P. Shultz, William J. Perry, Henry Kissinger and Sam Nunn. In Germany's Bundestag the CDU/CSU, SPD, FDP and Alliance 90/The Greens in January 2010 agreed on joint resolution 17/1159 which inter alia "calls for the withdrawal of US nuclear weapons from Germany". Given the escalation of the Ukraine crisis public support for Minsk II" and a "new détente" increased.

Egon Bahr and others have made repeated proposals to diffuse or resolve the current conflict through détente. Numerous prominent citizens have supported the declarations and proposals. In a joint statement representatives from churches, business, political parties and civil society called for 'a new policy of peace and détente NOW!'. But in public security debates these calls have been largely ignored.

Today, a broad public and multi-partisan discussion on the demand for a "new policy of détente NOW" is more necessary than ever. The confrontation in Europe has to cease and -- with benefits to the whole world -- an All-European zone of 'common security' through the cooperation of all states from Vancouver to Vladivostok must be created.

In order to facilitate the debate on a non-partisan and international basis, safeguarding the legacy of Egon Bahr, we want to establish a universally accessible archive on détente and cooperative security by means of the homepage www.neue-entspannungspolitik.berlin which will include links to documents, analyses and proposals, in particular from Germany, Europe and the US, aimed at making peace the central focus for foreign policy;

documents and statements of the United Nations and the OSCE, related to efforts for ending wars and the peaceful resolution of conflicts,
